1. Bertha has made it to the finish line. How long has it been digging? What changes will be seen in Seattle? (MAIN)
2. The classrooms where Washington students get the kind of advanced-level learning that grooms them for advanced-level careers might make visitors wonder if they've somehow stepped back in time. What groups are being left behind and what groups are filling almost all the seats? (MAIN)

4. Justice Bridge shared some startling statistics: Washington state spends an average of $_____ to educate a student each year, and $_____ to incarcerate one in juvenile detention facility. Education is "the best ROI that I could possibly think of," she said. There is "no better cost saving than having a child well-educated in an environment where he or she can be successful." Bridge also noted, "School disengagement is the very best simple predictor of being involved in the juvenile justice system." (MAIN)
5. Seattle Times Publisher and CEO Frank Blethen got right to the point in welcome remarks at a pre-event reception, stating, "We pride ourselves on being a progressive state, yet we tolerate a K-12 levy system that guarantees discrimination on the basis of what three things? (MAIN)
6. A family that lost a Norman Rockwell painting in a burglary at their home more than 40 years ago got it back Friday and knew for sure it was theirs because of a scrape and hole the exact size of the butt-end of a pool cue.

The 1919 painting, valued at $1 million and known as "Taking a Break" and "Lazybones," was returned to members of the Grant family by FBI art-crimes agents in Philadelphia. The piece was one of a number of items stolen from the family's home in Cherry Hill, New Jersey, during the June 30, 1976, break-in. How the Grant family came to own the painting might be an even better story. What's the story? (MAIN)

7. People in Oregon lined up to turn in their used soda cans and glass bottles Saturday, the first day of a new refund that doubled the amount they could get to ____ cents per can.
